Data collected before, during, and upon leaving the CYAAR may be used either for research purposes, or for programming purposes. It is important in our endeavors to support students in recovery that we maintain and continually update our programming to meet the needs of our students from year to year, as CRP students vary demographically and regarding their needs. As such, our testing may include well-validated metrics as the standard in the field, or more tailored surveys and batteries to measure features that are of specific value to CRP programmers and researchers. Periodic publishing of our findings will occur from time to time as well. We incorporate appropriate FERPA and HIPAA protections of your data, and any data that is used or published will be de-identified and will not be able to be reasonably linked to you as an individual. Your data is stored under password protection, with only select staff having access. None of your data for research publication purpose includes identifying information.

However, there is some risk involved. As a small cohort of 50-70 students on any given year, any published studies that include current student data may create risk. As such, any studies that include current student data will not identify the CRP itself, or the location from which the data is drawn, nor will such data identify the year from which it was drawn if such data includes students who may currently be enrolled. This is done for your protection. General standards at large research universities state the minimum of ten students must be achieved to report on any special population in a publication. Given the dynamic identities of our students and the rate at which stigma affects the recovery population, we seek to go over and above this threshold. Every reasonable attempt to ensure the confidentiality of your identity is maintained. Any further questions or concerns may be directed to our Assistant for Research Initiatives, Jessica McDaniel at jmcdan33@kennesaw.edu.

After reviewing the supplemental form on data usage, you may opt in or out of the data collection process without penalty.

- I consent to the use of my data for research and programming
